What We Need.

We notice a report that James Kelly, a wealthy citizen of Pennsylvania, has given $250,000 to found a school in which boys shall be taught mechanical trades. If this statement is true, Mr. Kelly is the wisest and best almoner of his generation. It is impossible to conceive of an institution productive of more private and public good than the one here named, or one that more aptly supplies a pressing social want. There is a need of academies for the practical arts, as there is no equal need in any other department of life. Largely our youths are growing up useless; no adequate practice for education in the productive arts is furnished by a satisfactory apprenticeship system, and even when employers are willing to give places to learners they are obstructed by the monopolizing rules of trades unions, which heartlessly deprive the men of future years of the opportunities for exercising their best faculties in the earning of a livelihood. Beside its material utilities, such a school comes up to the intellectual phases of the time. We have about done with old ideas of learning—that is, learning which consists of curious acquirements and not knowledge. We learn things, not words. Scholarship does not now consist of philological details and rhetorical niceties, but of principles and laws in the cycles of nature's activities. Like the physicist, the mechanic is king in the future of ideas—we mean the mechanic who is really a mechanician versed in the rules of his art, and capable, by his education, of following its higher developments. The graduates of a school of mechanics will take social rank that will banish the absurd opinion of any social inferiority of useful work, and the removal of any stamp of such inferiority means the improvement of the work by the advance of the workman.

A seminary is verbally defined, at times, as a place where a youth is instructed in such branches as may qualify him for his future employment; but our seminaries do not come up to such an interpretation, except in a very narrow circle of employment; yet this is the proper direction for our teaching to advance in. The seminary of practical art, as the sequel to the public grammar school, is a question to come before the public, and it will commend itself to the most thoughtful as a necessary part of adequate public instruction, as well as commend itself to the charitable as the most advantageous subject for private benevolence.

A City of Women.

Mrs. Leonowens, in her lecture on Siam, tells the following: "The central part of the capital city of Bangkok, in Siam, is devoted exclusively to the residence of some nine thousand women, among whom no man but the King may enter. The inhabitants of this inner city are the thousand women of the royal harem, and some eight thousand more, who are soldiers, artificers and slaves. This little world is ruled by women as magistrates, who administer the laws of the kingdom. There is no appeal from their decisions. Prisoners are arrested by sheriffs of their own sex. If it is necessary to chain them, it is done by their own sex. If a disturbance arises, it is suppressed by a force of five hundred Amazons, trained from infancy to the use of sword and spear. Meanwhile the slave women carry on a variety of manufactures, or go outside the walls to till the fields. The women of higher birth are 'sealed' to the King; the slave women may marry, but their husbands dwell outside the walls. The children, if boys, are banished from the city of women at six years old, only the girls remain. All the Oriental distinctions of rank are scrupulously observed within this strange realm, except that the magistrates are chosen for personal character and wisdom." Mrs. Leonowens speaks with great reverence of the woman who was Chief Justice when she lived in Bangkok, and tells some remarkable anecdotes of the courage with which she enforced justice against offenders far superior to herself in social rank.
